Lamb honored with National safety award

BY CHUCK VANDENBERG
PCC EDITOR

FORT MADISON – Las Vegas is a place for the lucky, but sometimes you go out there and earn some good fortune.

Fort Madison High School Associate Principal Patrick Lamb is in Vegas this week at a School Safety Convention at the Tropicana and was honored to have been nominated... and then win one of three national school safety awards.

Lamb said he was aware that he had been nominated by School Resource Officer Cory Brown and then got a message in late June that he had won one of the awards.

“Cory informed me in June that he had nominated me and several weeks later I got another message from him that I had been named one of the award winners,” Lamb said.

“It was little bit of surprise at first. It’s very

Fort Madison Association Principal Patrick Lamb was honored with one of three National School Safety Awards at a week-long school safety conference in Las Vegas.

Fort Madison Community School District for making the award possible and said it’s more of an award for the district. He just gets the trophy.

“It’s like winning the Manager of the Year award in baseball, you just manage a great program. I’m logistically minded and manage systems well, but Greg Smith the master of culture here,” Lamb said.

“He knows kids and I think that’s why we work so well together. He’s taught me a lot about nurturing and the role that plays in helping kids feel value, welcomed and accepted.”

Lamb, as part of the Associate Principal tasks, is also the security director for the district and has been in that role for the past five years. He took over for Bill Maupin and said the state has increasingly required more and more from schools in terms of security planning.

FMCS D gets “clicking” on a computer science initiative

$50K award from STEM council being put to good use

BY CHUCK VANDENBERG
PCC EDITOR

FORT MADISON – A focus on a district-wide computer science learning model is underway at Fort Madison schools after Richardson School received a $50K grant in partnership with the Governor’s STEM advisory council.

Kim Harmon, the district’s director of curriculum and student services, said the district applied for the grant in March and was notified at the end of April that it was one of six schools in the state to receive the award.

The money is not in the form of a direct contribution to the school’s coffers however. The money is set aside for reimbursement for purchases or to help offset training and teacher pay associated with enhanced computer science programming.

HARMON

Harmon said the district wrote the grant in a broad framework and now the extra financial support can be used across all grades in the district. Tentative plans include a four-year roll out of a K-12 enhanced computer science program.

Iowa has six STEM regions across the state basically divided by Interstate 80 with three regions below the interstate and three across the top of the state. Harmon said funds have increased in the privately supported STEM advisory council, so going forward each region will have two school awarded funds.

“Why did we get involved?... because of the importance of how computers are changing our lives and there is this need to teach kids computer science. We see it only in isolation at elementary levels and not to the breadth we would like even at the secondary level, but it needs to happen," Harmon said.

Harmon hopes to have full implementation by 2023

She said it's also important at the secondary level for students to have access to computer science programming because statistics show application numbers for those jobs are pretty low.

Harmon also believes that girls and minority students aren't seeing the potential for them in futures involving computer science.

"That's where we wrote the grant targeting that group simply because girls develop a bias about what occupations are appropriate for them, regardless of the non-sexist society that we try to create," she said.

Focusing on female and minorities could help them understand that this is a creative tool for problem solving and hopefully they'll learn those fundamental skills for computer science and start to understand the career possibilities.

"By the time they get to middle and high school, the idea of computer science doesn't interest them, and so if we can start them early we think we can ignite that interest."

Harmon said there is a team of 13 administrators, teachers, and coaches that are part of the planning and implementation team that is charged with how the district will embed computer science into the curriculum because it's a packed day at the elementary level.

She said a rough plan is already being framed out where a group of four teachers representing grades K-3 will form the first teacher planning and development group, or cohort.

The tentative plan outlined has a planning and development committee comprised for four teachers one from each K-3rd. The upcoming school year will be the training and planning year for that group, which Harmon called "Cohort 1". In the 1920-21 school year, those four teachers will start implementing and at the same time another cohort will come in from the next four grade levels. The goal would be by 2022-23 implementation is going on in all schools and at all levels.

She said the implementation wouldn't just focus on coding, although that is part of the proposed programming. Other areas will include software, networking, and data analysis pieces. The other area will focus on the cultural, ethical, and safety issues associated with today's computing.

Harmon said the other pieces help align the computer science curriculum with the district's goals of a rigorous curriculum, higher order thinking and problem-solving, and then preparing students for successful life after graduation.

"We see a really close tie to that so we hope others do as well," she said.

She said all students may not want a career in computer programming, but they need to understand that computers will be part of their lives.

"The goal is that it's happening in every classroom, but that's tentative. We have to gauge interest not only from the teacher's side, but the students' side and family side as far as what should that look like for Fort Madison because it needs to be unique for us."

Harmon and Superintendent Dr. Erin Slater presented to all the buildings in June with a heads up to staff as to what this was about. She said it could ultimately impact all teachers.

The district has had meetings with STEM advisory people and supporters engaged with computer science, including the 11 other schools in the region, to brainstorm what the program will look like.

"Anybody in our generation, and by our generation I mean 40 and over, the world we graduated into is not the same world our kids are graduating into and the career opportunities are so vastly different that we have to get past the notion that the way I was educated and the way I went to school is going to be ok for my child," Harmon said.

Harmon said the $50,000 Richardson Elementary was granted is not a blank check, but is a reimbursement for approved planning.

Honor is reflected in FMCS D culture

"They want to know more, as they should, about what your emergency response plan is... how you go about keeping your buildings safe. My role in it has just been to make sure that our administration and staff are versed in what we do in any emergency," he said.

The district implemented a threat assessment team two years ago that involves members from inside and outside the district to evaluate most information that could be threatening to the students and staff.

The district also implemented an anonymous online and social media reporting system for students to use to let district staff know about any possible situation that could affect a student or building's safety. That program, called 'P3' has been instrumental in the district getting in front of issues before any escalation occurred.

Lamb said the district is currently in the process of digitizing and making things accessible both electronically and physically, but he said culture is the one key component to keeping a safe and welcoming environment at the schools.

"Honestly it's culture. Are our students welcome? Are they accepted? Are they valued? Are we doing that everyday?" he said.

"When kids walk through the front doors do they feel like they belong. There's some scary research on stuff like that. I heard one yesterday at the conference - if a student doesn't hear their name used positively within the first 20 minutes of arriving, the chances of them having a successful day are very low.

He said the high school has three main doors and for the past eight or nine years, staff has been on hand to welcome students in the morning at the main door. Lamb said he would like to be able to greet all students coming in, but logistically that doesn't always work.

"Even talking to kids and making eye contact is a bridge that you might not otherwise have. And that's another scary stat, kids that don't have a positive relationship with at least one staff member in the building have a likelihood of graduating of less than 10%," Lamb said.

"Everything this award is about is 100% culture. You can drill and have plans in place. You can have a terrific design with what to do in an emergency, but if the culture and trust doesn't exist it's never going to work.
