Tourism talks start

REGIONAL EFFORT: Panel convening to discuss broader look at area tourism efforts

BY CHUCK VANDENBERG

MONTROSE - What began as a look at how Fort Madison can re-energize its tourism efforts has turned into a countywide look at the industry.

Fort Madison Mayor Matt Mohrfeld convened a panel of business and industry leaders who have a stake in reshaping the tourism model in Lee County, at the Lee County Economic Development Group's offices in Montrose last week.

The group consisted of advocates and officials from Keokuk, Fort Madison, and Lee County and was facilitated by Chelsey Lerud, executive director of Iowa Travel Industry Partners. Lerud, the former director of the Greater Burlington Convention and Visitors Bureau, stepped on with Iowa Travel Industry Partners as interim director in 2021 and was named to her current post this year.

She served with the Burlington tourism group beginning

Mohrfeld said the city's previous tourism efforts under Jean Peiton, a part-time tourism coordinator with the city, were "unguided, unsupervised, and ineffective."

"I'm going to say that as bluntly as I can. Good person but in the wrong seat," Mohrfeld said. "When she decided to

VETERANS

Lee County looking for volunteers to help transport veterans

LEE COUNTY - Have you been looking for a rewarding way to volunteer by helping those who have served in the armed forces? If you like to drive, are able to pass a background check, have a clean driving record, have the ability to pass a simple physical and are willing to be trained, you may be just the person we're looking for!

Many Veterans Need Transportation Many veterans need transportation to make appointments. Lee County provides that transport to our veterans at no charge, when drivers are available. Even if all the time you have is a couple days a month, we are able to work with your schedule. It is not required that you be a veteran yourself.

Drives are primarily to the VA Medical Center in Iowa City, but we may also go to Quincy, Davenport and occasionally to other locations. Interested parties may reach out to Nikki Sugars at 319-372-5853.

OPINION

Gas companies record profits not shocking

Surprise, surprise.

Exxon reported record profit sales for the past quarter. Over the past several months, including an interview this week, I've had an opportunity to discuss the economic downturn with both of Iowa's U.S. Senators. And both lay the blame of the downturn at the feet of President Joe Biden.

They're Republicans and he's a Democrat. We all know that's how the game is played.

But we've seen this play out time and time again. When gas prices go up, there's always the blame game from the right and corporate America for the rising costs, and gas companies never shoulder the blame, but then report record profits.

According to CNN, Exxon made $2,254 per second over the past quarter.

That's per second.

President Biden waived off recession talk this week citing a declining unemployment rate and job creation numbers, which probably work against each other.

I'm not an economist, but that seems to be part of the problem - creating jobs when people aren't ready to go back to work. Of course we need jobs, but just look here in our own backyard where we have more jobs than people to willing to fill them. Play close attention to that sentence structure.

I just bought a truck knowing full well I'd pay more for gas. I knew the game going in. So I don't get frustrated when the dollar figure rolls over three figures. But when I see profit margin's soaring while the rest of us adjust budgets to help pad those books, it is a bit eyebrow raising.

Everyone who sees these prices agrees with it, but they will engage in misdirec-

Obituaries/Opinion

Yellow trumpet vine makes first appearance

We have a yellow trumpet vine. Not the standard orange trumpet vine that you see a lot of, but yellow.

There was a huge growth of it just west of New London a few years ago. It was beautiful when flowered out, the pretty yellow horns seeming to trumpet to the world. I stopped to get a start from this yellow trumpet vine, also called Monrovia, hummingbird vine, or Campsis radicans. There were all kinds of suckers growing up. A lady in the house came out and told me to help myself, but cautioned me. She said the trumpet vine was very invasive. Seeing all the starts growing up, I could see what she meant.

Anywho, I brought the starts home and planted a couple around an electrical pole in our front yard. After five years of agonizing slow growth, it finally bloomed this year. Ginnie and I are so pleased. We had just about given up. But I seemed to remember that trumpet vine is a late summer bloomer. Sure enough. Maybe it will attract hummingbirds?

Googling yellow trumpet vine, I'm shocked to read that it is poisonous to dogs. How can this be if hummingbirds love it? As a kid, my mother showed my sister and me how to pull the "trumpet" off the vine and suck the nectar out (straining ants through our teeth). Oh, so sweet—one of my favorite childhood memories, next to gorging ourselves on mulberries while staining our hands and cheeks purple and red.

I'm so glad I got this start of yellow trumpet vine growing in our yard. During that derecho a couple of years ago, the wind tore out that big bush of yellow trumpet vine outside of New London. It's gone. But its offspring lives on, hopefully to grow into the big bush like its parent, welcoming all visitors to the Empty Nest Farm.

The yellow trumpet vine may be our one bright spot of this spring and summer's growing season. It rained all through May, so I didn't even get the garden tilled until the first of June. I quick like threw in some tomato plants, Indian corn, pumpkins and sunflowers. Then we left for Yellowstone.

Coming home, both Ginnie and I contracted COVID and I was down and out for another three weeks, not being able to do much of nothing. Consequently the garden grew up in weeds. Discouraged, I just mowed it all off, except for one cherry tomato plant. So, no garden. Oh, well. It might do the garden good to lie fallow for a year. Like me—ha!

While we were sick, the Japanese Beetles did a wholesale frontal assault on our aronia bushes. I was finally able to muster up enough strength to spray the bushes in time to save them. I forgot about our McIntosh apple tree. The Japanese Beetles stripped it. I don't think the apples will be any good. Criminy! We like to make apple sauce in the fall. And apple pie. And apple crisp. McIntosh apples are also one of the best eating apples, in my opinion.

Last fall our yard was riddled with mole tunnels. I set a mole trap, but I don't think it did much good. A friend advised us on how to use the mole poison. I bought some (it's sort of pricy) and was ready to do battle with the moles this spring. Lo-and-behold, the mole(s) disappeared! I can't believe it. Here I am ready to do battle and they (it) just up and vamoosed. What gives?

I wish I could say the same for the chipmunks. At one time there were dozens of them chasing each other around and digging holes in our yard. I just about have them eradicated now, but I still see one or two occasionally, taunting me. Grrr. Ginnie thinks they're cute (they are) and wants me to save them. Maybe I'll let the remaining few live their life and try to keep them from multiplying. Like the trumpet vine, they too are invasive.

Windfall tax seems to be working for Great Britain

is what makes America great. We have to have socio-economic stratification, that layering of the economy assures us that all jobs needing to be done, get done.

It creates wealth where wealth does the most good and creates the labor to create the wealth.

But Great Britian's conservative parliament in May, led by Boris Johnson, did something recently that we should give also give credence to.

It's called a windfall tax.

Great Britain has installed a windfall tax back as early as 1997 to offset record utility prices after state-owned services were privatized. The revenue generated was used to launch national employment programs.

In 2022, Johnson led the effort again to impose a heavy tax on energy companies which is being used to address the cost of living increases in England.

Right now these prices are running unchecked and I believe they count on us being empathetic to the economy as a way to slide the record profits across.

A windfall tax could be used to help offset the huge burden of not only the America Rescue Plan Act, but also the Biden Infrastructure Investment and Jobs Act.

It's my thinking that as the general election gets closer, gas prices will continue to go down. They could stay down as gas companies have taken the cream off the pandemic and war in Ukraine.

But at the very least we should be wagging a finger in the direction of the companies that are seeing these unheard of margins. The most we can do is ask our federal legislators to look closer at how record profits are being banked, while the economy sputters. Speaking of wagging a finger, the city's attorney Pat O'Connell of Lynch Dallas said at the last city council meeting that a last minute minor amendment to the insurance coverage required in the agreement was of little concern to the public.

The amendment to the agreement came after it was approved in an odd sequence that the council and mayor, to their credit, recognized. Councilman Kevin Rink asked if the council had just done something wrong, to which O'Connell made the remark.

The change had no bearing on the validity of the agreement, or its importance to the project, but the response from counsel made me shake my head - But that's Beside the Point.

More meetings planned with stakeholders

move on we looked at that and said it does not make sense to keep doing the same things if we want different results."

Mohrfeld said conversations began with the Fort Madison Area Chamber of Commerce and other people around the industry. He said everybody had ideas, but there was nothing comprehensive.

"That brought us to the concept of sitting down and maybe looking a little more strategically at what we want to be when we grow up."

Prior to the meeting, Mohrfeld and LeRud sat down and put together a list of stakeholders who could help create a new look.

He said the committee is not about preconceived notions and said he wasn't trying to promote a Fort Madison tourism initiative as much as what a southeast Iowa initiative should be.

"I don't know what that is and that's why we're here today," he said.

Kirk Brandenburger, the director of the Keokuk Area Convention and Tourism Bureau, said he was glad to be invited to the event, but said he didn't know about the meeting until about 10 days beforehand.

"I wasn't invited to this table until last Tuesday, officially. So I'm kind of an outsider and I'm going to try not to say much because I wasn't needed to."

He said tourism people have worked together in the county for more than 20 years.

"The tourism people have. The rest of you have not."
He mentioned the collaborative efforts in previous years of Henry County, Des Moines County, Villages of Van Buren, Lee County, and Hancock County. Now he said it's down to just Lee and Hancock counties in the Lake Cooper Loop program.

Brandenburger said he was looking for unity from everyone, not just tourism officials.

"I want to see everyone jump on board this train." Chi Eastin, manager of the Kingsley Inn in Fort Madison, and creator of the Lake Cooper Loop tourism event, said efforts need direction.

"We need leadership. We need direction. We need a lot of tourism items quickly - as fast as possible," she said. "I'm in the trenches every day, taking steps and speaking with visitors, what they enjoyed most and what they would like to see. I'm in there every day asking questions and documenting everything."

She said people are moving around again after the pandemic and the area has everything they need, they just have to "get it together" and "get it out there".

The group broke into several small group efforts focused on defining a regional tourism approach. After several presentations, conversations turned toward a countywide tourism structure with the possibility of a county tourism director functioning out of a central location.

Lerud suggested the panel meet at least two more times to fine tune the structures and make possible recommendations to other area groups about the findings and recommendations.
