ILLINOIS GIRL: Fedler granddaughter raises $1,100 to send vets to Washington D.C.

WEST POINT – Never underestimate the power of a child. Lee County has seen several efforts lately of children getting behind fundraising efforts and bringing home the bacon. On Monday, a 10-year-old girl from Abingdon, Illinois presented a check for $1,100 to the Great River Honor Flight program out of Quincy, which sends veterans on a one-day round trip flight to Washington D.C. to visit national military memorials around the capitol. More information on the flight can be found at <https://www.greatriverhonorflight.com/>.

Ellie Lepper, the granddaughter of West Point veteran Ron Fedler, said she was so taken with the reception for the veterans that she wanted to do something to help. “When my grandpa went to the honor flight and came back, I saw the red carpet and I was like, ‘Wow,’” Lepper said. “I was just very inspired.” She said some of the stories she’s heard about her grandfather’s time in the military made her want to help. Her brother, Dillon, is also now serving, both with the U.S. Army. “All the stories that I’ve heard when my grandpa went and someone called him not a good name, I didn’t like that.”

COMMENTARY

Iowa politicians ducking bulk of public scrutiny

For the past couple of years, Republicans often accused Joe Biden of dodging the media — refusing to sit for extended interviews, declining to be questioned in regular White House press conferences, depriving the public of the opportunity to see how he thinks on his feet and articulates his views.

In his critics’ opinion, the reason Biden and his staff avoided these unscripted events was the awareness he was not mentally agile enough to keep up with the demands pointed questions bring. The president’s supporters brushed aside those assertions — although Biden’s performance during the recent debate confirmed their worst anxieties.

I am not here to re-plow that political ground. Instead, I wonder why other political leaders much younger than the 81-year-old president are so reluctant to stand in front of their constituents, and journalists, and answer questions on a variety of topics.

Take, for example, Congressman Zach Nunn, 45, who represents Iowa’s 3rd District in the U.S. House.

Iowa’s longest-tenured public official, Senator Charles Grassley (who, at age 90, is nine years older than Biden), has made it his signature political strategy to visit Iowa’s 99 counties every year and take questions in each one.

Not all those events are open to the public, however, especially in the bigger cities. The progressive advocacy group Progress Iowa tallied several years ago that true public “town hall” events were held in less than half the counties. In most places, Grassley’s events were invitation-only events hosted by businesses,

Nunn needs to hold more open houses in district

service clubs and other groups.

But Grassley seems fearless with compared with Nunn.

Progress Iowa recently counted that since Nunn took office in January 2023, he has never held a town hall event that was open to all comers in any of the 21 counties making up the 3rd Congressional District.

Nunn has met with constituents in those counties, of course. But meeting with a select group, whether invited by the congressman's staff or a local host, is not the same as having an open-door event where anyone can attend and ask Nunn about his views and his votes.

Nunn's approach differs somewhat from the other members of Iowa's U.S. House delegation. Representatives Mariannette Miller-Meeke, Ashley Hinson and Randy Feenstra each have held at least one public town hall forum since their current House terms began in 2023.

Nunn's avoidance of these public Q&A events is baffling. Elected officials should want to hear from their constituents. It is an important part of the job. Town hall events give the officeholder the opportunity to explain their views on an assortment of issues.

That was why such public access to elected officials used to be more common than now. Governors Robert Ray and Terry Branstad met at least once a week with reporters and took questions on any topic the journalists asked about. Ray believed the sessions were an important way for him to stay plugged in on the wide range of concerns Iowans had, regardless of whether they supported him or not.

Branstad reveled in the give-and-take when he sat down with a group of Iowans. He was not naive enough to think he would avoid pointed questions. But he believed such sessions gave him the chance to directly explain himself and his positions to citizens.

Nunn must not understand this — or maybe he is not concerned about this aspect of public service.

A public town hall gathering where anyone can attend produces different questions, and a politician gains different insights, than occurs at a private Q&A event. A host at a private event is not likely to invite someone whose questions might make Nunn uncomfortable. And if the private event is at a business, it is unlikely an employee would risk embarrassing the guest — and the boss — with a touchy question.

While Grassley set the standard by visiting every county every year, State Auditor Rob Sand has gold-plated the Grassley standard by holding public town hall events in all 99 counties every year.

A few weeks ago, Sand released a schedule of 100 public town halls he will hold in the coming months. There is no guessing if Sand will visit a certain county. It's on the schedule on his office website. There is no question when, where and at what time he will meet with the public. It's on the schedule. And there is no question who can attend. Anyone can.

Rob Sand understands what Zach Nunn does not:

Even if some questions make Sand squirm, or if some force him to quickly gather his thoughts, or if someone from the other party pounces with an embarrassing question, Sand knows this is part of being an elected official. It just goes with the territory.

Alliant Energy crews gave an assist to ComEd in northeastern Illinois after more than 20 tornadoes touched down in the region last week. Crews from Fort Madison and Keokuk made the trip to assist.

Alliant crews help out in metro Chicago after twisters

CEDAR RAPIDS - Alliant Energy had dozens of workers return home safe this weekend after helping one of our peer utilities recover from last week's major storms in Illinois.

ComEd, an energy company serving northern Illinois, recently requested additional resources to help restore power after at least 24 confirmed tornadoes hit Chicago and surrounding areas last week. At one point, ComEd had approximately 430,000 customers without power.

We had 71 Alliant Energy employees from across Iowa and Wisconsin that answered the call for mutual assistance and went to help - including employees from Anamosa, Burlington, Cedar Rapids, Clinton, DeWitt, Dubuque, Elkader, Ft. Madison, Keokuk, Lisbon, Manchester, and Washington.

Mutual assistance refers to the voluntary partnerships we have with other energy providers in the region. During major restoration events, these partnerships enable energy companies to increase the size of their workforce by bringing in additional workers and equipment.

She said she baked with her parents for two days - one of them with no air conditioning.

They sold cake pops, party mix, brownies, zucchini bread, banana bread, and chocolate chip cookies.

Her mother Nicole and father Matt helped with the baking, and 'product quality'.

Nicole said she asked if her children could come to the orientation with her grandfather. After that and the return trip, Ellie wanted to do something to help.

"We were gonna have it at home, but a teacher at the elementary school asked us if we wanted to do it at the Legion. They were having a car show there and said we would probably sell out," Nicole said.

Ellie said one gentleman came up toward the end of sale and bought everything she had left.

"She was so impressed with how kind everyone was at the sale. I think we're going to do this again."

Nicole said she's received other contacts from people who want to continue donating. So the family is planning another bake sale.

Carlos Fernandez, the former general manager with WGEM in Quincy, helped create the honor flight program 15 years ago. He said he's not sure if Ellie is the youngest to fundraise or not.

He said the success of the program is based on the veterans and people who want to show appreciation and respect for the veterans.

"I don't want to say that she's the youngest, but she's pretty darned close. She must be quite a salesperson," he said.

"This is such a great project and fundraiser and it's wonderful to see the children get involved. It will send two or three more veterans to Washington D.C.," Fernandez said.

He said this is the 15th year that the program has been sending veterans to the nation's capitol.

The next flight is set for Aug. 15th beginning at Hannibal-LaGrange with a bus ride to St. Louis Airport and then to Washington and back. Donations can be made at the website above.
